Ravi Jadhav, the director of the beautifully produced and well-received Natrang (Marathi, 2010) and Balgandharva (2011), focuses his attention on sex education in the comedy BP (Balak Palak). BP also means blue image, which is like four teenagers (two boys and two girls) are educated about the facts of life since their parents refuse to do so. The story unfolds like a flashback. In present-day Mumbai, a couple (Subodh Bhawe, Amruta Subhash) stumble upon their teenage son's pornographic stash. The clock dates back to the summer of when four teenagers living in chawl fishing embark on a journey of sexual enlightenment. Avya (Rohit Phalke), Chiu (Bhagyashree Shankpal), Dolly (Shashwati Pimplikar) and Bhagya (Madan Deodhar) follow the advice of Vishu (Prathamesh Parab) as they discover the joys of called dhichuk-dhichuk. They make portions of adult literature, spy on a couple who make love and finally settle for a clandestine screening of a porn movie. Naturally, group equalions change thereafter: Bhagya begins to lust after the chawl's resident sex symbol, Neha (Sai Tamhankar), while Avya holds Chiu's hand in her surroson palm. For Jadhav's credit, he stays away from the double meaning and keeps the film firmly in a course of uas despite the audacity of the subject. Young actors play their roles admirably, and betray no awkwardness for being avid consumers of adult material. Like many contemporary marathi films, BP is rooted in an identifiable environment. Presided over by the stern but friendly Kadam (Kishor Kadam), the working-class chawl is both pleasant and conservative. It provides the space for teenage adventures, but has enough moral fiber to prevent adventures from being de-tained. BP is a film about the importance of talking to children about the bird and bee business that doubles as a piece of nostalgia on a community-based way of life in which experimentation and building share a discourse. BP (Balak Palak) premiered in theaters on Friday. Topics Learn More Edit BP is about four teenage friends (Avya, Bhagya, Chiu and Dolly), who hear that a friend, a resident of their colony, Jyoti tai, has left their colony as it has brought misfortune to their family.
